LA MISKITIA

with Fly Fish Guanja

LA MISKITIA

An aerial photograph of a coastal region in Honduras and Nicaragua, showing a dense green mangrove forest. A winding river flows through the forest, leading to a large, calm lagoon that stretches towards the horizon. The sky is filled with heavy, grey clouds, suggesting an overcast day.

La Miskitia is a remote part of Honduras and Nicaragua inhabited by indigenous tribes; lagoons, rivers, and lakes run through the coastal communities, connecting them all by water.

These waters teem with tarpon, snook, jacks, grouper, and many other species. Although some of the indigenous tribes survive on netting, the fishery is so vast that there are many areas untouched and full of wildlife, including monkeys, manatees, toucans, and parrots.

We encountered all of this in just one day of exploring. Hooking over 20 tarpon up to 150 pounds and Snook reaching 40 pounds.

We learned about a giant snook migration that goes from September through December.

We have a unique invitation to La Miskitia because some of our Fly Fish Guanaja employees are from the area and have families who are leaders in the community.

We've been invited to bring the first tourists back to the area in 10 years. Local and experienced fishing guides are waiting to put us on prolific tarpon and snook fishing. The time is now.
